

NEW YORK POST

LIVING TRAVEL

These 10 tiny bars will give you the world's biggest buzzes

By Perri Ormont Blumberg

January 24, 2017 | 2:42am | Updated

Bigger isn't always better.

For me, nothing beats the joy of walking into a faraway bar that makes you feel, even on your first visit, like you're home. Perched on that odd limb of familiarity and novelty is where we often find our most memorable nights.

When I first stumbled upon Beach Cafe on 70th Street and Second Avenue in Manhattan, it was like slipping into my own living room. Since then, I've circled the globe on a mad dash to replicate that blurry warmth. Ultimately, I've found that such soul is best discovered in the tiniest of places.

What follows is a list of intimate venues seating 10 people or fewer. Some have unmarked entrances, others sit at the end of narrow alleyways.

Sidele up to any of these bar tops to soak up the contagious magic of pint-sized playrooms.

Jackson Hole | Bodega

This unassuming gas station — yes, it still has functioning pumps — gives visitors reason to venture inside beyond a bathroom break or rack of Slim Jims.

Located at the base of Jackson Hole Mountain Resort, fulfill your après-ski fantasies with hot cocktails (or boozy slushies in the summer) and a funky fried chicken shack outside.

Pair that bird with a local brew from Roadhouse Brewing Co., and belly up at the seven-seat bar to eavesdrop on locals gossiping about ski-bumming trustafarians' trysts.

