It's easy to see why Jackson Hole is consistently ranked as the country's top skiing and snowboarding destination. There's the obvious (and infamous) steep and deep. This snow is naturally abundant. (In fact: this past February, a record-breaking 100 inches of snow blanketed the destination.) And its unbridled, rugged beauty, both on and off the slopes, is simply unparalleled. (Grand Teton National Park and Yellowstone are also in the vicinity.) Adding to Jackson Hole's allure is a refreshingly remote location, lack of commercial development (unlike its sister ski towns in Colorado and Utah), and something that just might surprise you: a topnotch culinary scene.

Baking at high altitudes can be a tricky matter, but you'd have no idea after polishing off some of the wood-fired pizzas at this Italian spot by Fine Dining Restaurant Group. Striking a fine balance between crispy and chewy, the pies come in a range of styles, from the classic margherita to the original scampi (topped with shrimp, bechamel, and green onion). And there's plenty of other comforting, rustic bites to round out your meal, including imported salumi and toothsome pastas.
